The first 100 years of perfusion medicine: the state of the art, current research trends and future perspectives. For the past 50 years, the preclinical laboratory has been a basis for modern perfusion medicine. Regardless of the type of organ perfused, from the heart to the lungs or kidneys, the development of techniques, strategies, and devices remains essentially the same. A growing number of clinical papers have been published over the past century. This article reviews the first 100 years of perfusion medicine, with emphasis on new developments that will shape the future of perfusion care. Anthrax continues to be a life-threatening, contagious bacterial disease. The only successful treatment of anthrax is to kill the anthrax bacilli with antibiotic medicines. Widespread use of antibiotics for prevention or treatment of anthrax is desirable. However, antibiotics are effective only if they are delivered to where the anthrax bacteria are growing. In addition, antibiotics are not effective against dormant anthrax spores that are slowly multiplying. A potential method for preventing or reducing the severity of anthrax is to vaccinate susceptible livestock, and humans, with attenuated bacterial anthrax vaccines. Anthrax vaccines are live bacterial vaccines, typically attenuated to have a lower level of virulence. Attenuation of anthrax can be achieved in many ways, such as via genetic modification. Typically, attenuated anthrax vaccines are used to protect humans from anthrax disease, as they are less damaging to the animal than wild-type anthrax. However, attenuated anthrax vaccines are often not suitable for protecting humans from anthrax disease, since the vaccine is less efficient at producing immunity in humans than in animals
