The number of sites offering free cloud-based backup services is growing every day. When it comes to choosing a solution, there are several things you can look for. First of all, what are you looking for? And what can you realistically expect from a free service? Businesses that turn to paid-for solutions for backup typically do so because they want support on a wide range of data types, including Microsoft Office documents, databases, email and virtual desktop files. These are just the essentials. With cloud-based services, the company has to pay only for the storage space it needs, as opposed to the many services offered by the likes of Dropbox. Paid-for services have a certain reputation, and this reputation usually holds them up to a higher standard. After all, if the company cannot provide reliable, timely data recovery, do you really want them to be running your business? When it comes to backup, none of the cloud-based options are a panacea. There are many pros and cons. In this case, the choice is made easier by how your organisation is made up, and what its needs are. Everybody needs a decent set of tools for creating screencasts. A good screencast is great to showcase your work to others, to explain a concept that you need to, or even to just show something you've done. If you're looking for something that will record and compress your screencasts, you've come to the right place. ScreenRip for Mac is a must-have tool for recording and editing video, as well as editing screenshots. It can not only create a single short video but an entire project, a sequence of shots, or a series of videos. You can also easily add a variety of transitions, make a custom soundtrack, change the size and resolutions of your videos, and a lot more.
