What's new in Angelus Brand VR Experience:

The Augmented Reality platform Place2Be offered a POV viewing of the VR event from the real deal courtesy of Magnum Studios. While not seamless, they did a great job presenting it not just as a bunch of different parts, but as one coherent whole. What really pushed this further was the optional external video app, that called 2MK's bases looking a cut above the average live stream apps. This was very slick, with particles and smoke and all sorts of magical things happening that made the little body cast bombs and the rounds coming out of the weapons look spectacularly real. Sizing your friends for mission! In the simulator, many of the details of the devices you were using were not apparent, but once the game show started you could feel the cooling of the simple and realistic-looking guns as they gathered in the touch-sensitive station, and it was interesting to see how things looked from the POV of each participant. The high numbers really don't matter here, as there's no sense of pressure to do well in the "game." Really, it's a fun exercise in learning what your friends will do under duress, and what they might be able to do! It's a great starting tool for team building exercises. What follows is a very short summary, reading too much into the details might be a mistake in this case. There were eight stations with eight simple and realistic-looking weapons in four shapes. In groups of three, each of the participants picked up a weapon and got into the bodycast station. The weapons were in an U turn, so one would have to come out and put the other two down. The controller told the participants to pick the best three. After coming out of the station, they were given a printed copy of a map of where to shoot. The participants would go back in, and without the help of the tell-tale triangular device point to where their fire would be directed. Then, they would fire. The whole thing was 99cents. It was open source, the first time that's ever been the case. Dota 2 Dota 2 is the most popular MOBA in the world. Earlier this week, the gaming community was treated to an in-depth look at its art, architecture, battle system, in-game economy, and character design. There's no real reason to write this
